DIRECTOR'S STATEMENT

All the film's heroes yearn for love, but they cannot give it to each other. They make rash decisions, and change each other's lives irrevocably. We can understand some of their actions, but we cannot understand others. In the film, I examine the relationships between the people, the invisible threads linking their lives, their responsibility for each other, guilt, and the attempt to forgive.

The film is based on the novel "Breathing into Marble" by Laura Sintija Černiauskaitė. It is about a typical middle class family: Izabelė, her husband Liudas, their son Gailius, and his newly adopted brother Ilja. "I cannot explain, I just feel," says Izabelė about her decision to adopt Ilja. Later, Liudas, who has eyes for other women, is unfaithful to Izabelė. Overcome with emotion, she decides to return Ilja to the children's home. Her son Gailius, who can see what's coming, tries to talk to his mother; but she has no time for him, and no inclination to listen. She tries to speak to Liudas, but he does not hear her. Living physically close to each other, under the same roof, the members of the same family have almost nothing to do with each other in a deeper sense, so much so that they do not even notice or hear each other. Surprisingly, their complex trajectories do not cross: they see each other from behind, they look at the bookshelves, they look through the windows, but they very rarely look each other in the eye. They know the others are there, but they do not see them. Tragedy is unavoidable in this story, so the heroes eventually learn how they are connected with each other, and they learn how they are responsible for each other. And that responsibility is not limited to this family. We are talking about everybody.
